He took off his vest, covering her torso. He noticed the dirty gauze bandage on her ankle had come loose, exposing the blister, her feet were bare and the sweat pants she wore were torn at the knee, stained with blood and grass. He looked around. "We need some water--something cold to snap her out of it."

"We'll have to carry her back to the tent. Dee has a first aid kit. Maybe she has some smelling salts." Mad Dog said as he stood up and began to pace.

"Give her a couple more minutes." Mason tapped her cheeks again. "She's been on the brink of fainting all night. You should've seen her face when I looked into the car."

"Yeah, well, you should've seen her face when you shot off that fucking rifle." Mad Dog kicked the ground. "You know what I'm thinking, Rambo? I'm thinking she was right after all. We shouldn't have brought her here. We should have let her stay in her car."

"Whatever you do Mad Dog, don't tell her that."

"I was married, remember? Rule number one of a married man is to never admit to a woman she was right. But after tonight, I don't think we'll have to worry about seeing Ellen again, unless she's pointing us out in a police line-up."

Ellen moaned. Her eyes fluttered open. The men hovered. She attempted to sit up but winced and then lay back down.

"Come on, Ellen, try to stand up. Mad Dog and I have got you." Mason reached his arm around her back, supporting her as she stood.

"I feel so dizzy," she groaned.

"You'll be okay when we get you back to the tent and you can sit down for a while," said Mason.

Mason pulled brittle pieces of grass from her hair. Relief swept over him like a hot, soothing shower. His shoulder muscles relaxed. He retrieved his vest and put it back on then wrapped his arm around Ellen's waist.

"You're bleeding," Ellen mumbled.

She drew her hand to his beard, delicately touching the open gash with her fingertips. She held her bloodied hand close to her eyes, studying it like it didn't belong to her.
